'Cake man' is sweet on service

"In war, the first thing you do is secure your perimeter. Why is the immigration service continuing business as usual? Stop immigration now."

"I voted for Al Gore. But after seeing President Bush in office for only nine months, and if I had it to do over again, he'd get my vote hands down."

"I am afraid that the news media, the broadcast media, in their rush to televise anything that comes out of bin Laden and Afghanistan could be putting us all in danger. What if there was something in code either in bin Laden's words or in the actions of the people on screen that sent a message to the cells. We need to be a little more circumspect in what we broadcast."

"People need to get a grip on their imaginations, and law enforcement needs to stop responding to every incident. Do we really think that the terrorists are targeting a woman in Miramar or a single employee or two of a newspaper? Terrorists are looking for large numbers of victims, not one case at a time. Get real, America."

"It is a sad, sad commentary on our society, our values and our whole way of life when in the interest of patriotism and supporting this country our politicians ask us to go shopping. How shallow we are. It makes it easier to understand why so many other societies around the world hate us."

"Our so-called compassionate conservative president ... is asking the children of America to send a dollar to the poor, malnourished children of Afghanistan. How about instead, they send a dollar to the poor, malnourished children of America?"

"Hollywood's Young Circle Park should not have any structures built on it. It is a park. It is not land Mayor Giuliani and her blundering bureaucrats can play games with. Like the casino property, it is owned by the people of Hollywood. Hands off our park, political hacks."

"Joe DiMaggio Park is supposed to close each evening at dusk. Webster defines dusk as the darker part of twilight. I'm not quite sure how Hollywood's park department defines it. Last night, my wife and I passed it when it was pitch black. The gate was wide open. Some effort should be made to stick to the rules as to when it should be closed."

"It is unbelievable that our country tolerates political appointments that are inefficient, don't know the first thing about their jobs."

Business offers free tastings to wedding crowd

BY JERRY BERRIOS

For Wilt Stallings — "the cake man" — the wedding crowd can be the toughest to please.

It takes more than free samples of his wife's gourmet cakes to sweeten up the brides, the grooms and the mothers-in-law-to-be who attend his Saturday morning tastings at Field of Flowers in Davie.

IT'S A PLEASURE

It takes enthusiasm and a sense of humor.

"He seems to have customer service under control, especially with all those fickle women," said newlywed Kim Delaurier of Cooper City, who visited the store twice to make up her mind.

She said Stallings gave her samples to try out on relatives: "The mother-in-law had to taste it." She settled on a white chocolate cake with white chocolate truffles and fresh raspberries.

Stallings and his wife, Susie, own Susie's Scrumptious Sweets, which began as Susie's hobby 13 years ago. Now it's a thriving family business. In addition to weddings, they make custom cakes for special occasions like birthdays and baby showers.

The couple have been dishing out free samples at the Davie store, 5101 S. University Dr., for almost five years. Wilt Stallings said 100 percent of their sales come from the tastings.

"That's why we do it," Stallings said, presiding with a spatula over about a dozen cakes. "It's the best form of advertising."

But selling the icing for someone's dream wedding takes patience.

Stallings, 57, spent more than 45 minutes with Deanna McSwain and Tony Diamante as they struggled between the Key lime cake and the white vanilla with Bavarian cream custard for their Nov. 9 wedding in Margate. They tasted about six different cakes, with Stallings dishing out ever more samples and explaining the flavors.

"It's a hard decision for your wedding," McSwain said. Stallings is at his best when the eight seats in front of him are full.

He recites the offerings enthusiastically. Among them: Key lime cake with Key lime custard; chocolate Kahlua cake with chocolate Kahlua truffles; and banana cake with chocolate sour cream ganache, his favorite.

"You tell me what flavor you like, I can probably get you what you want," Stallings tells the crowd.

Ice-cold water and espresso help wash down the samples.

He also serves up some advice.

"I have been married 30 years," Stallings tells Monica Camero of Hialeah, who is tying the knot Nov. 24. "Marriage isn't 50/50. It's a 100 percent/100 percent."

Across the store, Susie Stallings takes cake orders. The couple communicate on a two-way radio.

"He truly enjoys being with the people," she said.

Wilt Stallings said being the cake man isn't so different from his regular job as a construction coordinator at Magna Casa in Fort Lauderdale.

"All I'm trying to do is relate to people," Stallings said.

His philosophy on work and life is all about fun: "If you have to dig a ditch, sing a song."

Psssst! Want to buy, sell frequent flier miles? It's a risky route

BROWARD CONSUMER

Cindi Kurczewski, Delta spokeswoman. "It subjects the violator to damages and litigation."

If a traveler is caught using someone else's awards — or using a ticket issued in someone else's name — the ticket will be confiscated and the traveler will have to pay the fare, usually at a much higher cost, Kurczewski said.

There are no state or federal laws prohibiting the transfer of mileage to someone else. However, it is a violation of your membership agreement with the airline, said J.R. Kelly, director of the Florida Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services.

"We don't get any complaints about people being ripped off by people selling or purchasing frequent flier mileage," Kelly said, because travelers know it violates airline policy. "Think of it as someone having a membership card to a gym and then allowing a friend use that card — the contract specifies the membership is only for that person."

has been buying and selling mileage, awards and points for more than seven years.

Jerry Hershkovitz of First Class for Less, a ticket broker, said he pays around one cent per mile, which means a person would get around $1,000 for 100,000 miles.

"Right now, we're receiving too many calls to handle because people are afraid to fly," he said.

If saving money is the purpose of going through brokers, Kurczewski said, it's cheaper to go through a travel agent or find deals on the airlines' website.

Delta Airlines will take action against anyone caught using someone else's awards, points and frequent flier mileage.

So far in court, the airlines have generally prevailed in civil cases claiming fraud against airline brokers and in some cases have gone after the buyer and the seller, said Ed Perkins, consumer advocate for the American Society of Travel Agents and a nationally syndicated travel columnist.

"The airlines have been very diligent in prosecuting brokers and purchasers," Perkins said. "It is very risky, and not worth it."
